

The Retained EU Law (Revocation and Reform) Bill – Rushed, Risky and Undemocratic by

Eleanor Duhs, Barrister and Partner at Bates Wells (3rd February 2023)

At the end of the Brexit transition period, EU law which applied to the UK, was turned into domestic law. The aim was to provide “maximum certainty” as the UK left the EU: generally, the same rules would continue to apply across the economy, including in areas such as farming, food standards, environmental law, employment law, financial services, privacy and many more. This gave certainty to individuals, businesses, investors, and the government. This vast body of law preserved after Brexit (over 3,700 pieces of legislation in over 400 policy areas) is known as retained EU law. In terms of repealing and replacing retained EU law, the policy was that it would be for “democratically elected representatives in the UK” to decide on changes after “full scrutiny and proper debate”.

This Bill seeks to:

- Sunset most retained EU law by the end of 2023 (see clause 1(1))
- Change the way in which any retained EU law which Ministers decide to keep is interpreted (see clauses 4 and 5)
- Provide Ministers with wide-ranging powers to restate, revoke or replace retained EU law (see clauses 12 – 15).

If Ministers do nothing, the default position is that retained EU law simply disappears from the statute book by the end of this year.

Peers are urged to use the debate at the second reading to point out that:

- This Bill means that if Ministers want retained EU law to fall away, they need take no action. The decision to take no action is not subject to Parliamentary scrutiny. Examples of rights and protections which could be lost in this way include:
  - the right to equal pay between men and women;
  - workers’ right to 5.6 weeks of paid holiday per year;
  - the 48-hour maximum working week for road hauliers; and
  - food safety standards.
- This Bill represents a huge transfer of power from Parliament to the Executive. It gives Ministers powers to legislate on areas which affect our everyday lives without meaningful democratic input.
- Far from creating new “high standards regulatory frameworks” the replacement legislation cannot increase standards – it can only keep them the same or make them lower (see clause 15(5)).
- Reducing standards or allowing key pieces of legislation to simply lapse could risk the UK’s trading relationship with the EU at a time when we can ill afford it.
- The proposed speed and scale of the changes are unrealistic and likely to result in mistakes and omissions.
